GEORGETOWN NEWS.

Collected by Republican Reporters.

Captain James Epps, of Richmond, Va., is paying his old Georgetown friends a visit.

The alarm of fire last Saturday was occasioned by the burning of a quantity of shavings and chips which accumulated under the steps of Mr. Fizzpatrick's auction store, on Bridge street, just above High. The fire department turned out with alactity, but their services were hardly necessary under the circumstances.

the circumstances.

Officer Harper arrested and put under lock and key Charles Green, William Jones and Daniel Green, three well-known Washington roughs. The row began with Charles Green, who made himself too loud in front of the market. On endeavoring to take him in charge the officer was assaulted by Green's friends, and but for the help of some market men would have fared badly.

ket men would have fared badly.

The publit of the Dunbarton M. E. Church was filled yesterday by the Rev. H. A. Gross, of this city, as the pastor proper is at present engaged in conducting a thriving camp meeting at Washington Grove. Mr. Gross was converted some two years ago, and has since turned his attention to the ministry. At the late session of the quarterly conference of the Dunbarton M. E. Church he was licensed to preach, and delivered his first sermon yesterday. The text was chosen from St. Mark, eleventh chapter, twenty-second verse. The discourse was a fine one and properly appreciated.

THE UNWILLING BRIDE.

The northern part of Georgia is a wild, pleturesque country. The gold found in this egion had, in earlier days, drawn to the viinity adventurers from nearly every civil-

Thirty years ago many men of broken-down fortunes from other States came to northern Georgia with the hope that the fickle goddess vould prove kinder to them in this new venue to wealth than she had deigned to be in other vocations.

Among these was a family named Loser, who had become much reduced in circumstances and were as unsuited to their present surroundings as it was possible for people to be. Luis Loser was a middle-aged man, of singular grace of person and elegance of manner; and his wife was a faded, helpless woman of fashion, torn from her native sphere, and transplanted to this uncongenial land against her own con-of eighteen, named Kate, and one of fourteen years, named Edua, were her children by her first marriage.

At the time our story opens, Mrs. Loser, a delicate-looking woman with a peevish expression on the face which had once been radiant with the ophemerel beauty of lilies and roses, lay on an old-fashioned sofa in the spacious hall of the dwelling.

Her toilet corresponded with her suroundings—a much-worn morning dross of dark silk with frayed trimmings, was finished at the throat with a tie of coffee-colored lace, and a pair of well-worn satin slippers covered the a pair of well-worn satin slippers covered the small feet, thrust out as if their owner was small feet, thrust out as if their owner was proud to display them.

Her slender, useless-looking hands were ornamented with glittering rings, and in one of them she held a worn-looking volume which she seemed to be reading with some interest. Suddenly a rush was heard, and Kate Leslie, her daughter, came swiftly across the veranda and entered the hall, carrying in one hand a package of papers and letters, and swinging from the other a large straw hat simply trimmed.

A more striking contrast to the inert creature on the sofa could hardly have been bound. The girl was full of life, energy, ambitious to run a brilliant career, and it was evident to those who knew her that she did not intend to be disappointed in her aspirations if the consummation of her wishes depended on herself.

Kate was in the heyday of youth—a brilliant suckling humatic the research best light to the consummation of the light was shaded by the constant of the light to the research best light to the constant of the light to the light to

You."

Your Kate left her mother's presence in a tempest of feeling it would be impossible to portray. A flerce battle was raging within her, and she also trembled before the dread that she would never be permitted to reject the lover who came with the power in his hand to release those she tenderly loved from the hopeless dreariness of their present existence.

"Good Heaven! is she so far gone as that?" caused this illness? What is the matter with her? It was not brought on her by dread of my arrival, I hope."

His eyes flamed, his tips trembled and his brow grew stormy as he uttered the last words.

Catching at the chance his jealous fears suggested. Loser deliberately said:

There was a slight stir within, and a falter-

There was a sight stir within, and ing voice replied:

"I had rather not see any one just yet, mamma. Give me time to bathe my eyes and get calm, and I will see and talk with you. O! if you love me, leave me alone now!"

To this passionate adjuration Mrs. Loser replied:

"I must see you at once, Kate. I have something that is most important to say to you. Something that you ought to know, as it may help you to a decision as to what is right for you to do."

After a slight delay the door was unlocked, and Kate, with swollen eyes and a pathetic expression of helplessness upon hor face, looked with trembling dread upon the mother who, she know, had come to throw some adnick-nacks such as young girls like to collect around them.

The walls were covered with pencil sketches made by herself, faucfully framed with autumn leaves. Among them was found the shadowy outline of alyoung man's head, so lightly drawn that the fair artist seemed afraid away from her now is a wrong to both of us.

"That is the ghost of my happiness, mam

"Such a lot of papers and letters never came to this house at one time before! I've been to this house at one time before! I've been to the office myself on Flyaway. Here is a letter for you, mamma, all the way from California, and by that token, if I did not recognize the writing, I should know that it is from Dick Staunton. Time indeed that he should write, for it is two years since we had a line from him, and we were all so good to him too!"

"Can it not? when he owns the very roof living is drawn? It is true, Kate. He holds to say to me, but I suppose it was best to write to me under the circumstances."

"What can you mean,mamma,and what does Mr. Stannton say? Am I to conclude that Dick has become a millionaire, and wants me to help him spend his money?"

"Well, I do declare! If you haven't hit on the very thing itself. He doesn't say that he's worth a million, but he gives me to understand that he is very rich and getting better affects of says does not be because the had battled so hard to sustain descreted her. Her breath came in low, gasp-destiny. It would mine, if I were in your place."

While her mother spoke Kate had flushed scarlet, and then grown pale as death. She asked, in a breathless sort of way:

"Do you believe it is quite trae?. Do you think Dick can really be in earnest?"

"I have no doubt he believes what he says himself, and I see no reason why it should not be true. Why do you grow so pale, Kate? It must be all right, for you liked him well enough when he was staying here with it is and he made no secret of how much in love with you he was. Indeed, till lately, I thought there was some sort of promise between you."

"Well, I do declare as if you couldn't answer that yourself! If you had promised Dick I did not think you would carry on with Harry Conrad as you have such a pass as this? Paupers! dependent on Richard Staunton for the very bread we have eaten, he will demand his payment of me, and I dare not refuse it! I know the kind of man he is—he would set us adrift, penniless, homeless, to beg, or starve, should I prove false to that silly pledge given in childish thoughtless-ness, and oh! so bitterly repented of since!"

Her voice sunk into low, sobbing murmurs, and her mother's pity for her was mingled with exultation that she seemed to yield at once to the necessities of her position, and accept the fate it was so much to the interest of the whole family that she should not refuse.

A week passed away and nothing was heard of the expected layer from California although Harry Courad as you have done since he came among us. It's a regular fittation, and he's awfully in earnest, child, though he hasn't a foto of land he can call his own, nor money in the bank either. Of course, you will send him adirift now; you ought to have done it whom he first presumed to speak to you of love."

"But I liked him then, and I more than like him now," said Kate, abruptly, "I—I made a sort of bantering promise to Mr. Staunton, but I had no idea he would ever be in a position to claim it. He asked me the day before he left us if I would remain single two years to give him a chance to make a fortune that would enable him to place me in such a position as I was born to fill. He had tried so many things and failed at them all, that I thought it quite safe to reply that I would walt ten years if he wished it. He could not have believed that I was in carnest."

"But he evidently did, my dear, as you will see when you read what he says. By this time Dick is on his way back, and he may walk in on us any day, expecting a warm welcome from the girl for whom he comes with a fortune in his hand. Read his letter and you will see that he does not mean to give you up."

With an air of listless dejection Kate held out her hand and accepted the letter offered by the sown? That he will tolerate no interference on the part of any one, and if I have indulged in any girlish fancles I must put then aside and prepare to welcome my true lord and master when he comes to take ne to himself? Loser watched him cynically, wondering if Kate's memory would be so deadened by the potion he had administered to her as to enable her to play the part he had assigned her in the tragi-comedy about to be enacted.

Suddenly Staunton lifted his head and saked:

"When can I see' my dear girl? I must judge of her condition myself, and she had best be propared to receive me. Her mether can do that."

can do that."

Loser was nearly at his wit's ends, at a loss to know how he should deal with this impetuous man, and quite certain in his own mind that his sudden intrusion into the sick girl's apartment might produce results as fatal to his appiness as to Kate's life

After a pause, he replied:
"You do not understand how low Kate is: you. Something that you ought to know, as it may help you to a decision as to what is right for you to do."

After a slight delay the door was unlocked, and Kate, with swollen eyes and a pathetic expression of helplessness upon her face, looked with trembling dread upon the mother who, she knew, had come to throw some additional load upon her young shoulders, heavy as was the one she already had to bear.

The apartment of Kate was simply but tastefully furnished. In it were found the few books she claimed as her own, her guitar, her perfolics of dried plants, and many little nick-nacks such as young girls like to collect around them.

The walls were covered with pencil sketches made by herself, fancifully framed with autumn leaves. Among them was found the knak specific fancifully framed with autumn leaves. Among them was found the last been to me through all that long and lightly drawn that the fair artist seemed afraid to make it too distinct lest it might be recognized. A wreath of wild flowers hung over it, and concealed the words faintly traced beneath—"My ideal."

The head was certainly a very noble and handsome one, and Kate deserved credit if she had drawn it from her own conception of what is grand and true in man.

Her mother glanced around as she came in, unwilling to look straight at her daughter and see in her face the signs of the bitter struggle she knew she had been passing through. Her eyes fell on the phantom head, and she said:

"This is something new: I have not seen it before. Have you taken to drawing ghosts," "Words! words! words! do you think to pursue, I am losing the last grain of patience that is in me," he cried, almost furi-ously. "Words! words! do you think ously. "Words! words! words! do you think I am to be put off with them, Luis, when my very heart is aching to see that dear face which has been my beacon star through all the efforts I have made to make myself rich for the sake of the smiles it would lavish on me in time to come. Go-go-I will not be trifled with another moment." Loser thought it best to obey this imperious command, and got out of the room as quickly as he could; but he paused a moment in the hall to review the position, and reassure himself as to his power to manage the complication of affairs so as to bring about a satisfactor. factory denouement, well knowing that if Stanuton got the slightest clew to what had taken place between Kate and Harry Conrad he would wreak a terrible vengeance on them
